

Long-Term Illness and Mental Health Support

As a caring employer you provide employees with benefits that practically and financially help them if they become ill. But what if an employee cannot cope with their illness or the questions it raises? How do you support them then?

Supporting employees when they need it most

RedArc's unique Personal Nurse Adviser service guides people suffering from the impact of long-term ill health with practical, considerate telephone advice and emotional support throughout their illness.

Our team of qualified and dedicated Personal Nurse Advisers have specialist experience in a range of medical fields – mental health, oncology, cardiac health etc.

They are well equipped to help individual patients with their different challenges in a number of relevant ways:

Valuable advice on specific treatments, how to navigate the NHS and get the right medical care

Relevant therapies or counselling, based on clinical assessment

Tailored, 'signposted' information on the illness, linked charities and support groups

Regular, compassionate conversation with the same qualified Personal Nurse for as long as the patient feels the support benefits them

RedArc can integrate with your employee benefits so employees are encouraged to make best use of the medical care available to them, either through the NHS or your private medical insurance.

As the employer, you are reassured that expert support is on hand when your employees need it most, supporting and advising them through their illness journey.

RedArc has helped over 23,000 patients in the UK and 97% have rated the service as good or excellent. We adapt to meet peoples' individual needs.

Long-term illness and mental health are the most frequent reasons for getting us involved.
